Passengers Knocked Down and a Panic Narrowly Averted.

When it was discovered that no great damage had been done and that, at all evenis, nobody had been seriously injured, the Princeton resumed her course towards the Jersey shore, and was gliding along smoothly, when suddenly shrieks and shouts once more rent the air, this time from the decks aft.

The echo of the first shriek had scarcely been drowned by the second one when another crash sent the now thoroughly panicky passengers once more sprawling upon the floor.

Again a babel of shrieks, groans, curses and commands ensued, and this time it seemed actually miraculous that none of the passengers jumped overboard. Everybody was badly frightened and probably expected instant death.

"It's all right, shouted some one. "It's nothing at all. Just a rubbing of noses between our boat and the Kingston."

This was said so jocularly that the passengers nearly all recovered their presence of mind and began reassuring their neighbors.

The Kingston belongs to the West Bhore line, and was probably swept by the tide against the Princeton. The latter had drifted considerably out of her course after the first collision.

This, at least, was the belief expressed by Supt. Robert Bloomburg, of the Pennsylvania railroad's ferry-boat service, who said to-day that he would not see the to give out the true reason of Pennsylvania railroad's ferry-boat service, who said to-day that he would not be able to give out the true reason of the collisions until after he had received freports from 1 iots Lowell M. Decker, of the Princeton, and William Longstreet, of the Hudson City.

The damage done to the "Princeton," gives unmistakable evidence of the real daiger to which all on board had been placed by the second collision.

Although no praise is sufficiently great for the man who restored order by humbrously describing the collision as a mere rubbing of noses between the two boats, he was wholly mistaken as to the real cause of the shock.

From the report of one of the employees, it appears that in addition to the guardrail and a lot of ornamental

It is likely that the United States authorities will cause an investigation in order to fix the blame for these collisions where it belongs.

Passengers on both boats realized that a collision was unavoidable, and a panic was averted only through the conheaded conduct of several gritty men.

Women and children commenced to shriek, men swore and shouted, and nearly everybody sought safety by pressing back upon the crowd in the cabins and aft.

Then came the crash. Both boats had reversed engines as soon as it had become evident that the collision could not come evident that the collision could not mearly as great as had been expected.

Still it was severe enough to throw people off their feet, and to tear an ugiy breach into the low deck of the Princeton. The Hudson City escaped injury.

Policeman Rath found a six-chambered revolver behind the bar of the saloon. It contained six empty shells, which looked as if they had been freshly exploded.

Patrick J. Sheridan, the proprietor of the saloon, told an "Evening World" reporter this morning that Baum and Adams frequented his saloon, and were of respectable family connections.

He was informed that they went into the saloon while Blanco was cleaning up and got into a row with him over the payment of drinks. They were intoxicated and attacked Blanco without provocation. Then, he supposed, Blanco defended himself. Blanco has worked six years for Sheridan.
